

H. H. H. H.

ΣAMI
Z▷AT ◁AMI
3△AT

• Hyperborea

Milorad Pejić

Hyperborea

Translated by

Omer Hadžiselimović

*The person who finds his homeland sweet is a tender beginner;
he to whom every soil is as his native one is already strong;
but he is perfect to whom the entire world is as a foreign place.
The tender soul has fixed his love on one spot in the world;
the strong person has extended his love to all places;
the perfect man has extinguished his.*

Hugh of Saint Victor (1096 – 1141)

- The Decks of the Titanic

New Zealand, South

*Good is the country that has no history, a new country.
We descended to Milford Sound crawling down foggy canyons, but the cruise was sunny. You remember longest the fast boats that in their zig-zag paths
leapt from one shore to the other like water bugs.
Lacking ruins, they showed us some rare moss
and squeezed us through under the waterfalls.*

*Fortunate is the country that has nothing to remember,
a young country. You open it gladly and with curiosity like an outdated encyclopedia in which Che is still not executed, our cities still intact.*

New Zealand, North

*This land is sleeping on its grave. Beneath the gentle hills sprinkled with sheep, volcanoes are simmering like crocodiles buried in mud.
It's a matter of hours, not days or years. Just as long as it takes for the tide to rise and flatten
the hot seals of our footprints in the black mud along Muriwai Beach.*

*This land lets us into her parks as if onto the decks of the Titanic. In her short future we look somehow dated, you and I on the bench under the thousand-
-year-old kauri trees. We love this last trip on which,
disguised in our true faces, no one recognizes us.*

Cologne

*Thrice have I gone to Cologne to marvel at the Cathedral.
And every time in the anemic month of April when the city parks, weary newborns, are recovering from the wet winter and when stone dominates on both sides of the Rhine. Nowhere are you so faceless as by the Rhine, a businesslike river that makes no distinction between corpses and torn-off trunks
that it keeps rolling northward.*

*The first year we examined the underground treasures,
blood and sweat conserved in gold. Strict guides strove in vain to conjure up the power of the all-powerful,
to bring to life greasy bishops' staves in showcases.
Another time we climbed up among the bell towers to feel the loftiness of the lofty, but the magic was gone when we saw a dove's nest in a dragon's jaws
and a facade washer with a stereo hung on a lightning-rod spike.*

*Thrice have I gone to Cologne to marvel at the Cathedral.
To ask and not be answered. And every time in the panicky month of April, when ant people dominate the squares.
Don't ask why and wherefore such a glorious edifice!
You won't be answered until you yourself, an anemic ant, stand in front of those four-sided doors. Nowhere are you so puny and insignificant as in front of Cologne Cathedral, with the German God.*

Praha

We were daily pawns on the black-and-white sidewalks of Old Town. In the early evening we'd pull ourselves from the game to drink beer with friends gathered around a hot topic like around a dish: the life and work of Raymond Carver, and everything else „that makes us grow.“

If you know what you seek you'll easily find in the Mother of All Cities. Only the sign for Vyšehrad was masked by advertising posters for cigarettes on the last day when we were sneaking towards the cemetery for deserving citizens. But don't worry: the two spires of the Cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul are a good enough landmark for tourists armed with thick lenses. And those who truly go to Vyšehrad know where they are going.

New York

The homeless of New City live underground. In the off-limits labyrinths of the disused subway they have found a roof over their heads. „Ferdinand the Bull,“ a good man from the state of Texas, has not seen the light of day for thirty years, but in the darkness thick as tar he’s found peace and calm. On the ceiling of the central station he painted an oak-tree crown, with gigantic limbs forking into blind tunnels.

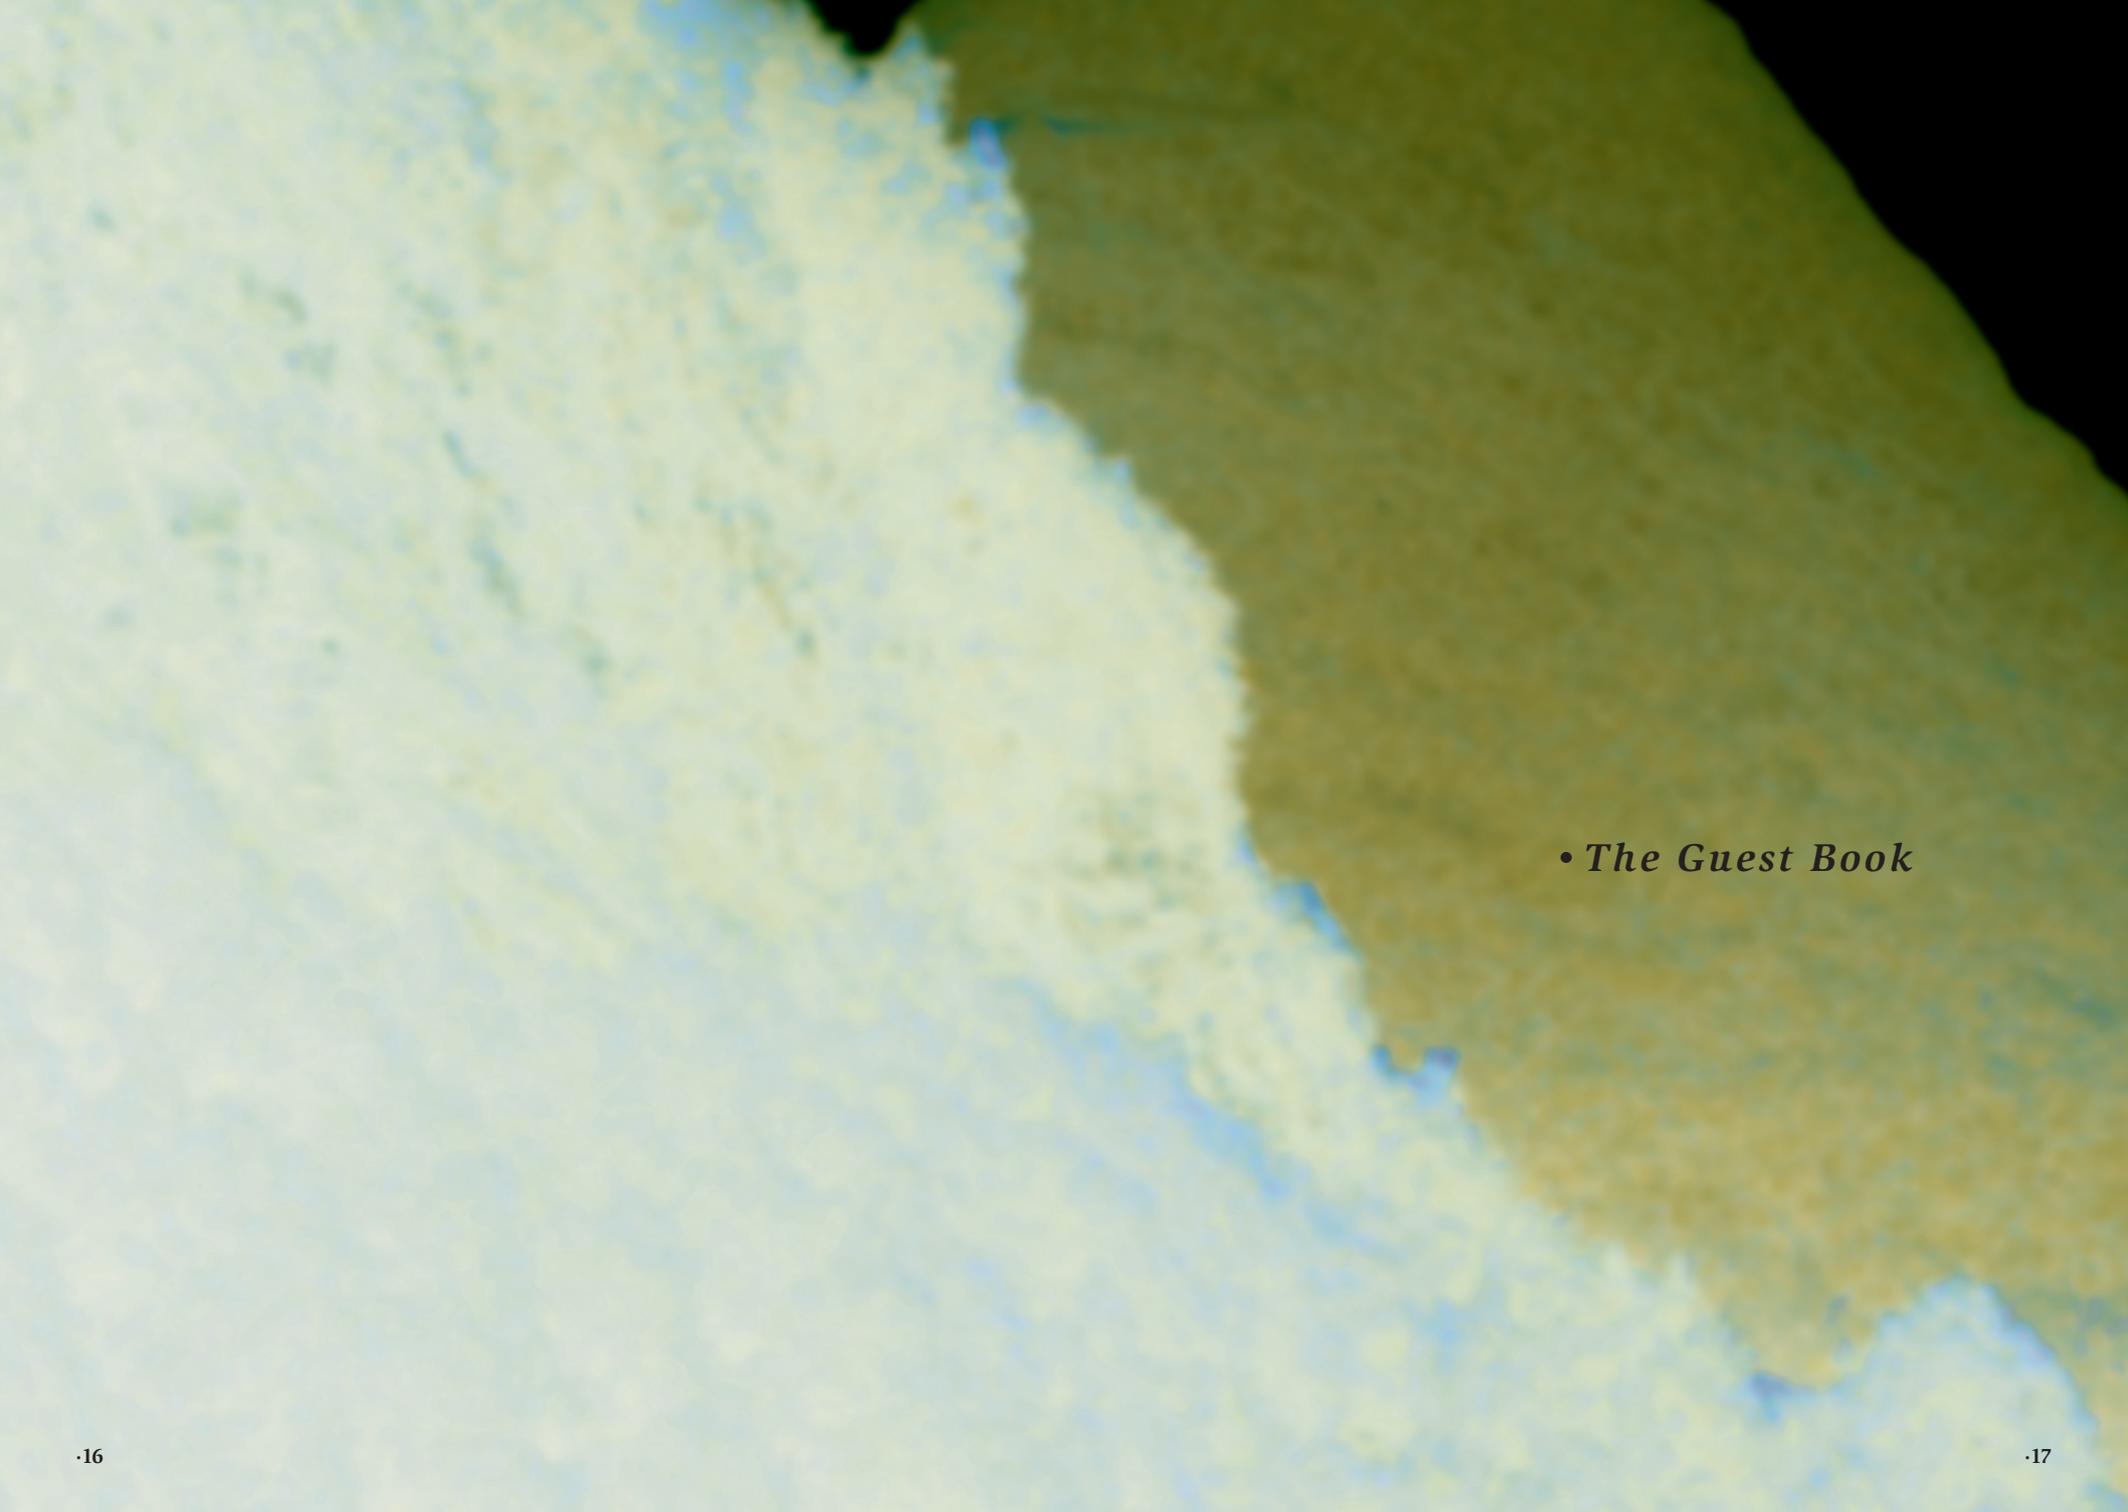

He goes up into the occupied city only at night, during the curfew, after the south wind from the sea mows down the stench of urine and gasoline. While picking through garbage containers, from the corner of his eye Ferdinand weighs out the power relationship, an advantage that keeps shrinking but with which he always unerringly returns home, fleeing the charity of city authorities. Every morning he packs up again all that he owns and with the folded mattress on his back, like with a snail’s house, he sniffs the air.

Queenstown

In Queen’s Town we waited for our lost luggage sunning ourselves all day long at the small coffee shops on the pier. I don’t know what we were ordering, but they brought us just what we’d thirsted for. We’d remembered Queen’s Town from before: this time, the town, too, was recognizing us until our delayed backpacks – our house and bed for the days and nights in the mountains – arrived and until we said goodbye to people.

In the jungle, wherever we spent the night, we spent the night amidst birds that recognized us, defending their invisible nests to the last drop of their blood. We slept also on the glaciers, on the snow that remembered us, melting our bodies into the whiteness of paper. And when we descended into the valley, on the pastures that recognized us, we lazed in the grass among the sheep as among scattered stećaks.*

 Medieval tombstones in Bosnia and Herzegovina and its neighboring countries.*

• The Guest Book

Padjelanta

*Here is where clouds start to reflect themselves in the black holes on the slopes of Ahkka, and where patches of snow dry on invisible clotheslines.
In the evening, tents mill around on reindeer pastures
like turtles. That sight will stay with you for days, whenever you look back. As will the suspicion that you are at the end of the world.*

Everything here is in its right measure, but the terrifying roar of the waterfall does not overwhelm the squeak of a grouse. Vast is everything and inaccessible along the path through Padjelanta, but the codes of strength are in the rolling of tiny stones or in the helicopter attack of a mosquito.

*It ends nowhere. Wash your face therefore in a handful of the cataract from which, little by little, an ocean will hatch.
If at night while you are sleeping on the rocks the scent of ironed pillowcases comes into your dream, pack up your vitamins and soups, go home – it's late. From Padjelanta you will not take anything else but the knowledge that you live in the wrong way and in the wrong place.*

Sarek

Fear not my darkness if you are infinitely happy and have your own light when you fall into my jaws, like a glowworm.

*I'm a draftsman of maps, the most precise ones.
More accurate even than the originals of nature itself. Into the cobweb of watercourses and bluffs hung from the sky I draw you also on every trail you are walking on. For each a point in every instant. Thus I squander centuries on a task that, being without purpose, can't be completed.
With a cloudburst I flush down the two-legged ants
in the evening and shut down the guest book.*

*But be not afraid of tomorrow's day, of the open sea of fog under which, like under a pillow,
either paradise or hell is sleeping curled up.
You are not lost even if you are infinitely unhappy provided that you follow the scent of a moose.
Only keep away from your thoughts: deliberate suffering, calculated loves... Watch out for those precipices. They are the hollow teeth in my jaws.*

Sylarna

Every new step on the stairs of travel takes me back in thoughts to some previous floors. Like drunken cars at weddings I drag behind myself all the remembered faces, empty beer cans. Telephone poles move aside and pass by.

Last summer the whiteness of the city from Vršani Hill reminded me of an old hiking trip to the Sylarna Massif. We were snowed in in the middle of September so we looked for shelter at the wind observatory. The days as short as the time it takes the tea to cool down. In the nights thick as ink, the sleeping-bags zippers fart.

I know exactly when and how the moment of deliverance comes, but it always surprises me. Under the morning sun's magnifying glass, like in a reflector's beam, glaciers emerge. Like snowdrops. On the way home I keep warm by climbing down the stairs of travel from time to time. Across from the Center Movie Theater under renovation, the homeless in the park sleep wrapped in the pieces of the cinema screen like in the snakeskins of movies we have watched.

Tarfala

I don't like intact nature when humans have their hand in it: combed-up waterfalls and made-up glaciers all packed for sale. Let them dry freely and drip into Tarfalajaure. It's enough that on your way to the heavenly lake and back you are spied upon by an alley of telephone poles screwed into the precipice.

Civilization woke me up only when the bus burped stopping outside Gällivare Hospital to discharge its humpbacked passengers. On the bench in front of the main entrance a huge body of a woman was sitting. It was struggling to stay awake and pull itself together, but the drugged mass kept pouring onto the pavement like dough. I don't find joy in the wonders of nature that God's had his hand in.

Geiranger I

The sun descends into Geiranger every day like into a well. Like a needle onto a gramophone record, the beak of a gull slides down onto the water, green and blue.

The same age-old idyll. Only the houses under the sky are empty, not a wisp of smoke. The people in them Geiranger has used up, but it still watches over the houses and cultivates them like mushrooms. Nailed on the precipices they suffer from gravitation like from a headache.

Tour buses crawl up the serpentines like ants at dusk. There's no panic in the harbor either: unhurriedly, the campers with their doggies go out for a walk, the fishermen shower their boats. No one suspects that the sun, like a dropped sequin, is sinking for the last time into the dark-blue depths of Geiranger, forever and irrevocably.

Geiranger II

All my life, when awake, I've sought a small plateau from a dream of long ago, a place for a house by a thin cataract, white like a ribbon from a half-opened book. I saw such a clearing when traveling once over the "Sju søstre" waterfall, but I couldn't recognize it, blinded by the sequin of the sun in the dark-blue and dark-green depths of Geiranger.

From time to time I open my bird-cage of wishes, but my birds do not fly out any more. I'm too old to begin and to dream ahead. I don't see well any more. I cut my nails from memory and voices, too, come to me colorless, as if from the loudspeaker at railroad stations: the clamor of children on the precipice above the „Seven Sisters“ waterfall. When we played in the yard, they used to tie us around our waists with a clothesline so we could withstand the magnets of the abyss. So we could keep together. Today we are scattered out across countries like crabs across fjords.

Gaustafallet

When we returned from Serbia, we did not stop at home even to check our mail. Craving for the wilderness, we pushed on still farther north, like a drug addict reaching for the merciful dose after a weekend spent with the parents in the country. I drove all night through Stribor's forests. From time to time we would get out to breathe the air, and when the dawn stopped us suddenly by the sign „Gaustafallet,“ we were no longer fit for great undertakings.*

Like sleepwalkers, aimlessly, we climbed down the steep path to the explosion of white water that had awoken us. You, from your dreams, and me from my thoughts of a vineyard on Fruška Gora in which a stooped old man is milking the grapevine. Between the charm of Gausta Waterfall and that of the parched slope in bleak Hopovo, in my thoughts he chooses his own suffering.

 In the story by I. B. Mažuranić, the enchanted Forest of Stribor must remain enchanted until it is entered by someone who prefers his own misery to all the good fortune of the world.*

• Friends in the Universe

Discoveries

I read the papers while they're still cold, just brought in from outdoors, from minus twenty-seven. From this morning's papers I remember only one forlorn article: stuck in among the ads and Christmas greetings like a quick cake recipe was a list of scientific advances in 2003. Glass had been invented that refracts light at a negative angle.

Fortunate are those untouched by this, whose bodies always find their way back from every mirror. The wife of a real-estate executive puts down her comb and perks up her breasts a little before heading out to the annual bridge-club dinner.

Only four percent of the Universe you inhabit is normal matter: the stars, the hills, the cars. All the rest is black mass and dark energy. At peace is he who doesn't know. The taxi driver who is selling minutes waiting for the wife of the real-estate executive. In a 13-billion-year-old Universe, his life is not the blink of an eye. It's nothing.

The Planet

I don't understand my children - such devastation. That I still go to work is only for the love of the last bird in the sky and the last fish in the water. Until recently I'd spun around my axis in a rapture, like a ballerina: today, I no more feel the joy of rotation.

Profiteers are falling from fatigue, losers go to museums to see the sunset in the Amazon jungle. I don't play favorites with my children. When I take off my shoes and step into the darkness of space, all of you will be at my funeral.

The Flood

The first indication of the advancing flood is fear of water. One thing is the Bible and its arks, and quite another real life at the bottom, when the hell of free water comes through the bloodstream of houses into faucets and showers. Small children in parks are rotting in raincoats.

Friends in the Universe

*Those I know have grown old, my scattered friends.
The snow is rusting in Sweden, from the other side of the globe meager electronic messages: either there's a fire – or there isn't one. No news is news anymore, they've heard it all, my tired friends.*

*Only memories are news we are still curious about.
We approach memories undoubting, yet carefully.
As when, back on our street, we were teaching a stray cat, black with white paws, to eat from our hands.
Though hungry, she'd smell our rings first.*

The Crash

*Simple is the mathematics of life and death:
it is enough for place and time to coincide.*

*Odd Knutsen, a physical laborer at the Stavanger canned-fish factory had planned his vacation at a warm sea. On his way home from third shift, he would check the status of his credit cards and around noon, before going to bed, he would sniff
his sunscreen lotion.*

*At last the day arrived and snow-white clouds stuck on the peaks of the Alps reminded him
of cotton candy amid little children's hats at spring fairs in Boknafjorden. A wonderful sight, an unplanned opportunity for a break, will be rejected for the sake of travel discipline.*

*What we learn we learn too late. That black point, that magnet in which place and time overlap,
you can't fool. The mustached driver of the Greek rig had decided for the sake of travel discipline
to forgo his habitual steak at the little restaurant
with plastic ivy near the small town of Airolo.
Those clouds reminded him of the toxic fumes around exhaust valves in the industrial zone of Milan when a white Volvo, blinded by the setting sun at the St. Gotthard Tunnel exit, crashed under his feet. When leaving its own it vanished into universal darkness.*

The Citadel

On the noose of the polar circle I'm using up last summer's last days: the color of my tanned skin is finally reverting to the color of snow. The body forgets.

But the camera lens remembers. For months not a drop of rain on the Pakleni Islands. The oldtimers sit among beer bottles and stare at the open sea through a curtain of rhododendrons. They no longer recall what they miss.
But we, who are foreigners everywhere, have not lost hope.
We climb at mid-day up the town's dorsal fin, on narrow steps, like mercury in a thermometer, to the top of the fortress. We then go down into its bowels, saved in the grave.*

The small dungeons are built in the shape of horizontal cones, narrowed down to points of light in the rampart, tiny windows through which the prisoners, as through a peephole, peer into the world. They crave for a bunch of mandarins on market stalls, for the cry of a seagull between the two blues... Through the peephole of the dungeon, as if under the microscope, the longing for freedom grows manifold.

 Islands located off the southwest coast of the island of Hvar, Croatia, opposite the entrance to the Hvar (city) harbour.*

*Vršani

I came from afar, invited by a friend, to look and to see. We climbed together with the sun up the desolate orchards on an overgrown path between the prehistoric haystacks that looked like knocked-down church bells. From the top of the pyramid: two separate towns on two sides of the world and two century-old forests down the northern and the southern slope.

My friend invited me from afar to listen and hear the blood of water at the Dragon's Fountain and the water of blood in Mad Hašim's Well. The secret of the indestructible. But as far as the eye can reach and thought can grasp, the closest to me is that which has perished: the windows of Vršani. Outside, the grapevine gone wild around the iron bars is dragging, like an octopus, its prey to the bottom. Inside, the black holes of forsaken life hold with their mass the structure in balance. Until the apocalypse prevails.

 An abandoned village on a hillside near Tuzla. The Dragon's Fountain, „Zmajeva česma“ in the original, is a fountain with famously good drinking water that springs from Zmajevac Hill. (The water there is said to be, in the Bosnian idiom, „dobra ko zmaj“ - „good as a dragon“, i.e., exceptionally good.) Hašim was a mentally deranged man who, in 1936, first killed his wife and then his daughter, whose cut-off head he threw in a well, later known as Mad Hašim's Well.*

• The Gurgling of Sand

When Death for the First Time...

*When death for the first time knocked at our door,
it had come across a mine field, like an empty boat.
A pollen cloudlet on the hazel twig it had brushed against was still quivering, that I remember. Also, that those who have the softest stride are those who don't know where they are going, sleepwalkers across a fire-swept zone.*

*Here, in the bigger world, one annuls oneself with the keys on the keyboard. Death is prescribed with a prescription, or it comes quarterly like a water bill. The dying of the body is nothing else but material fatigue, and souls are archived into brown files. Even the cemeteries are calculated:
occupied and vacant squares laid out precisely like Lego cubes, with contents on notice boards like in books.*

For More than Ten Years

For more than ten years we've been doing the same things, each in his yard, and yet I've not exchanged a single word with my neighbor. I heard his voice for the first time when he learned that he was mortal: colon cancer, an aggressive one.

*„Though it seems to you, friend, that I've been living without purpose, I've had many plans since I began carrying my death behind my belt. Since darkness can descend any moment now, I simply see things in a new light. I no longer approach things with self-interest: a pheasant and any bird make sense.
Even toward my grave I move without hind thoughts – with the curiosity of a calf approaching and sniffing the butcher's knives before slaughter.“*

Einstein

I don't ask questions, but answers come to me from your students, Albert! Albert, I know less and less! What are they seeking in the dark? Light?

With every new discovery I am a step closer to the already seen. The mathematics of the future takes me back to your childhood, to a sunny fair on Schrankenplatz. Sibylle the Gypsy had stolen you for a moment, that famous-fortune teller who reads palms as if she were reading poetry.

*Sibylle the witch enticed you for nothing, just for play, to amuse the brutes. But when you reached out your hand to her and when she brushed the dust off, she fell silent. She gripped the counter with the skins on it.
Everything stopped, everything turned to ice, as in the tale of Sleeping Beauty. Only, from a different fairy tale, the dripping of chestnuts here and there on the green could be heard. She was looking for the light in the gloom but, like a merry-go-round,
there was a black hole spinning in your tiny palm.
Something not yet seen! And Schranken Square was tumbling into it as into a concrete mixer.*

The Pharaoh

*When I, a tyrant, was laid down in the sarcophagus, and when the stone block clicked like a key in the lock,
everyone heaved a secret sigh of relief. The blades of grass rose up as after rain they shake off the weight of water droplets in the wind. Only the cressets were left to burn down. And the masons to be beheaded so that the memory of the labyrinths leading to me would be erased.*

*Still, I'm not resting in peace – I, a ghost in a bottle.
Those who still keep the memory of the masons haunt me like a bad dream. They've been picking away around me day and night for generations, digging into my brain. Because of their picks I cannot hear the gurgling of sand: the chirping of tiny birds in the field.
Tyrannical dreams! But sooner or later the gates will open.
The cork will pop out of the champagne bottle.
Welcome to my grave!*

The Story of Bonnie and Clyde

Frank Hamer loved his job, but it seems to me he was quick-witted. That's what Bonnie and Clyde felt also, although they'd never met him. The days grew tedious and meaningless when they began to suspect that their pursuer was losing control and was lagging behind. She'd then leave the key in the door on purpose or would leave, as if by accident, one extra glass for the unexpected guest.

I can't conjure up spring in Bienville Parish in color. Blood had been spilled in black and white: America heaved a sigh of relief. I suppose that only Frank could not fall asleep: he lay all night with his eyes open as if listening to the pillow. Life had become empty and meaningless. He stopped blackmailing paper carriers, he stopped spying on their neighbors, he stopped contriving decoys... Little by little he completely lost his human face.

The Crusades

You are good boys: you die well for our cause, that on our bank accounts. The repulsive flags of plunder and perdition. Scoundrels turn their eyes away so as not to see: they feed pigeons at fountains. Some of the booty will come their way, too.

The sick powers, instigators, and followers... Déjà vu. The naive ones can't perceive darkness until darkness breaks out. Model citizens. They also are innocent until the lie, like electrical breakers under overload, goes bust.

Afghanistan

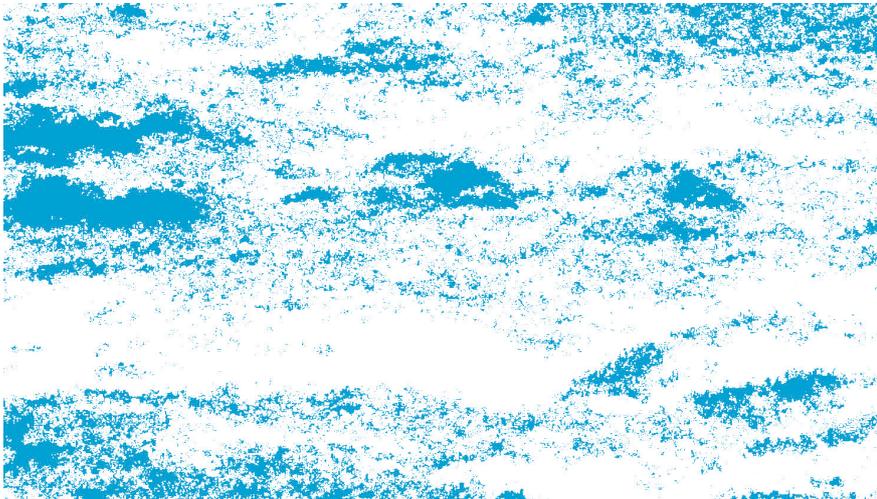

*They've killed our interpreter:
who will interpret for us?
Who will take us out of this fucking movie
when we have no interpreter?
When we are deaf to what we hear
and blind to what we see
even without an interpreter.*

The Terrorist

*I have consideration for your honorable intentions
if you are indeed sent to tear down capitalism.
But your suicidal stings are piercing my five-year-old daughter's sleep like a soap bubble. Like acorns onto plates, your shrapnel are falling into a Sunday lunch.*

A summer evening in the life of an ordinary man fans shameless lust here as well as in Samarra in spite of lies from my TV channels and in spite of the exhortations of your prophets. Sunshades drooping like snowdrops, sunblinds at half-mast...

*We are what we are when we shed our wax-paper shirts and change into our naked bodies. But in light of double darkness we hardly recognize one another, marionettes of a puppet theater. Then we go down onto the stage, into our play, and you come to me as if you were a guest, emptyhanded and dead ahead of time. A bang, and then applause. Behind the set,
the gloves of your and my executioners are shaking hands.*

• Hyperborea, the Reserve Homeland

Mycenae I

I'm fed up with people, Giorgos, give me your hand, let me into one of your poems so I can rest in the shade of an olive tree! Long ago, when you told us of the injustice that lies heavy on the scales of civilization and of the greed that like a plague spreads to everything it touches, that peers even into baby cribs – we didn't quite believe you. We thought you were exaggerating but we were with you because we knew how to suffer.*

Today when I talk of the greed that like a black hole devours everything it touches I have nobody on my side. No one wants to know because no one wants to be unhappy, Giorgos. I was with you when you were suffering – let me end up in one of your poems! Set me down, say, in Mycenae, like a porcelain homunculus in the button box, among the huge stones.

* Georgios Seferiades (1900-1971), Greek poet and diplomat.

Mycenae II

When shall we live, Giorgos, when shall we live? I don't see a way out of the vicious circle in which, like mice in a wheel, we run ceaselessly without ever seeing a way out. The only escape: while locked in it, to lock ourselves into ourselves. But shall we ever again lie under the pines above the fallen-down stars on the waters of Lake Modrac and talk?

Today we have a place to sleep and something to read, but we are nowhere as happy as when, long ago, we were unhappy, when we had nothing – neither „mine“ nor „yours.“ We forget fast, Giorgos, where we are and where we are going. When shall we talk? Who will get us out of this vicious circle of pride into which we sink deeper and deeper as into quicksand?

Hyperborea I

I don't know who I am nor what my name is, but I had a happy childhood. Many years ago I was taken from a cage in the „Phnom Penh“ orphanage and adopted. They chose me out of several girls like me, just as the fine people at the Bodéns flower shop select the most beautiful of many identical orchids.

They took me to distant Hyperborea, to night without day in winter and day without night in summer, but I had a beautiful youth. I traveled everywhere and returned home from every place to my native Hyperborea never asking who I was nor what my name was. I didn't care. Only now, in advanced old age, my fingers sweat for the first time and stick to the cellophane when in summer-vacation photo albums warm waterfalls and gigantic ferns come along. The blood remembers.

Hyperborea II

Whenever I return to Hyperborea, I carry heavy thoughts from my native land. They are an added burden for the plane's engines, but after so many years without a home and without a key of my own, I don't watch over them carefully, as I do over my personal baggage.

But I still gladly eavesdrop on conversations in both languages about dried-out river beds that are empty graves back there and about rainy summers here. I look with curiosity into the lives of others the way one peers into other people's shopping baskets at supermarkets.

I gladly return home to Hyperborea, but I would not die under its flag either. I love it in a profiteering way. When the wings slice through the clouds and roll out the forests and meadows and lakes under me, I fall exhausted into them as into an aired room. Into freshly changed linen.

Hyperborea III

*When I arrived in Hyperborea, my reserve homeland,
I came as a man in his prime. The long days of summer were drying strung on the nail of a calendar like tobacco leaves, smelling sweetly, but my thoughts were still roaming far away, in the basements of Gradina Hospital, where I'd left my father behind, alone in his last night.
I know that shells were falling on the city all night, on the living and on the chestnut allée, and that they stopped at dawn, but to this day that night's shrapnel seek me out: the peeling underground shelter's ceilings in which no one is sitting by one of the deathbeds.*

Before I arrived in my reserve homeland, I'd only heard of it from a Greek myth. That it's a lonely island where no one dies a natural death, but when the time comes and children grow older than their parents they go out on their own and throw themselves off a cliff so they won't be a burden to anybody. I'm fifty now and time and again dawn finds me as hoary as a birch tree under frost. In a couple of years I'll be older than my father, who is no burden to anyone. Who knew a lot about Hyperborea.

About the Author

Milorad Pejić

was born in Tuzla, Bosnia and Herzegovina, in 1960.
Since 1992 he has lived in Sweden.

His published books of poems include:

Vaza za biljku krin [„The Vase for the Lily Plant“]
(Svjetlost, Sarajevo, 1985)

Oči ključaonica / Die Schlossaugen [„The Eyes of Keyholes“]
(Übersetzung Florian Knobloch. Bosanska riječ, Tuzla-Wuppertal, 2001.)

Hyperborea
(Aula, Prague, 2011)

Oči ključaonica / Die Schlossaugen [„The Eyes of Keyholes“]
(Übertragen von Aida Bešlagić und Alexander Lohe. Bosanska riječ, Tuzla-Wuppertal, 2012)

Hyperborea
(Fondacija Mak Dizdar, Sarajevo, 2013)

The Eyes of Keyholes
(Translated by Omer Hadžiselimović, Červená Barva Press, Sommerville, MA, USA, 2015)

Treći život [„The Third Life“]
(Bosanska Medijska Grupa, Tuzla, 2015)

Hyperborea
(Translated by Omer Hadžiselimović, Samizdat, Prague, 2016).
Bibliophile edition.

About the Translator

Omer Hadžiselimović

(1946 – 2016) was born in Sarajevo, Bosnia and Herzegovina. He was a professor of English at the University of Sarajevo until 1994. From 1994 to 2016, he lived in the United States, where he taught English at Loyola University and North Park University in Chicago, Illinois. He wrote a popular book on British travellers in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Na vratima Istoka [„At the Gates of the East“] (Veselin Masleša, Sarajevo, 1989, and Boulder, Colorado/New York, 2001). In recent years, he was engaged in translation of poetry from English to Bosnian and vice versa.

Translator's Note

I am indebted to Ann Clymer Bigelow for lending me her native speaker's ears - and eyes - and for suggesting better English formulations for a considerable number of lines in Pejić's poems. All the possible errors that remain, however, are my own.

I'm also grateful to Wayles Browne, Stephanie Krueger, and Sasha Skenderija for the ideas I found in their translations of the poems „Discoveries“ and „Friends in the Universe,“ published earlier.

CONTENTS

• The Decks of the Titanic

New Zealand, South	·10
New Zealand, North	·11
Cologne	·12
Praha	·13
New York	·14
Queenstown	·15

• The Guest Book

Padjelanta	·18
Sarek	·19
Sylarna	·20
Tarfala	·21
Geiranger I	·22
Geiranger II	·23
Gaustafallet	·24

• Friends in the Universe

Discoveries	·28
The Planet	·29
The Flood	·30
Friends in the Universe	·31
The Crash	·32
The Citadel	·33
Vršani	·34

• The Gurgling of Sand

When Death for the First Time . . .	·38
For More than Ten Years	·39
Einstein	·40
The Pharaoh	·41
The Story of Bonnie and Clyde	·42
The Crusades	·43
Afghanistan	·44
The Terrorist	·45

• Hyperborea, the Reserve Homeland

Mycenae I	·48
Mycenae II	·49
Hyperborea I	·50
Hyperborea II	·51
Hyperborea III	·52

About the Author	·54
-------------------------	-----

About the Translator	·55
-----------------------------	-----

Published by Samizdat

www.samizdat.nu

Editor: Adin Ljuca

ljuca@centrum.cz

Design & layout: Mario Chromý

www.mariochromy.com

Print: Milan Hodek

www.paperjam.cz

Prague MMXVIII

